

Foreign Affairs - Youngsters in U.S.

Sunday, June 26, 2005

[LOS ANGELES] Thirty Taiwanese young people participating in a series of training courses organized by the Formosa Foundation will begin visiting US congressmen next week, foundation officials said yesterday. Over the last week, the group, 10 of which are university students from Taiwan and the remaining 20 who live in the US, have taken courses on communication techniques, crisis management, the Asia-Pacific situation, Taiwanese history and culture and US-Taiwan relations, in preparation for their roles as "goodwill ambassadors."

Starting next week, they will visit US congressmen, government officials in charge of foreign policy and experts from various think tanks. The participants in two previous training courses have visited more than 200 senators and members of the US House of Representatives to exchange opinions with them and present issues of concern to Taiwanese-Americans.

Photo: Ambassadors attend workshop "How Congress Works" (Formosa Foundation)